Lynn Munoz joined our team at Glendora High School two years ago. She initially taught health and natural science. This past year she also taught biology. As science department chairperson at our school, I first met Lynn at our interview panel. She caught our attention because of her enthusiasm. She has a psychology background in addition to her education degree so we felt that she would work well with our struggling students, who usually took natural science. I have observed her class, and she does connect well with her students. She creates a safe, supportive environment in her class. Students who were not in her current class would pass by to say hello.

Her lessons are well organized with a clear objective. She supplements her text book with outside sources, such as Youtube videos or surveys, especially when the current sources are lacking information. Her students were on task, her classroom was well organized. Students knew to grab worksheets for the day, and also knew they would be starting the class with a journal entry, which she uses to have her students personally connect with the material. She incorporates stories about her personal life to help convey relatable scenarios to help students understand the concepts. She uses assisted note taking strategies to help students pay attention. As she presents material, they fill in key words or phrases.

Overall, Lynn is a kind, caring teacher who works very hard at preparing lessons, presenting material in an interesting manner, and connecting on a personal level with her students.

Sincerely,
